Arizona voter registration increases following General Election

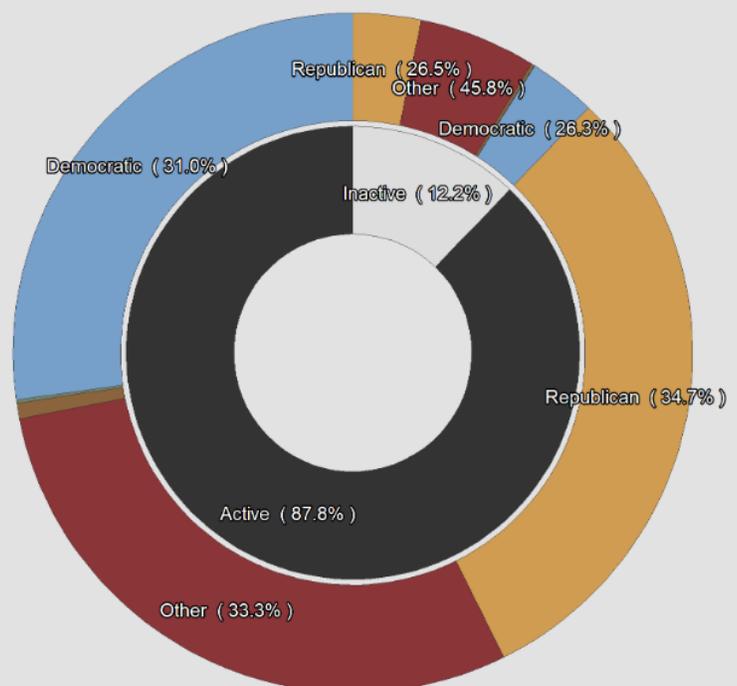

PHOENIX—Arizona Secretary of State Katie Hobbs announced today there are currently about 3.8 million active voters in Arizona.

This number reflects an increase of more than 66,000 active voters since the November 2018 General Election. Currently, there are also nearly 525,000 inactive voters in the state. Inactive voters are still eligible to participate in elections, but are labeled inactive if there are questions about the accuracy of their registration information, and they are not able to receive official election-related mailings.

Quarterly Voter Registration Update, January 2019

	Republican	Democratic	Green	Libertarian	Other	Total
Active	1,313,023	1,172,216	6,610	32,374	1,257,995	3,782,218
Inactive	139,177	137,852	1,428	5,780	240,561	524,798

Arizona today has nearly 3.8 million “active” voters. Active voters are those who have met the minimum requirements to become a qualified elector and have an address on file that accepts official election-related mail. There are an additional 500,000 “inactive” voters who maintain their eligibility to vote, but need to confirm information about their registration in order to receive official election-related mail.

“The increase in number of registered voters in Arizona since the election shows that there is a growing interest in participating in the process. That’s great news for our state, and it means we need to continue the work being done to make our elections more efficient, secure and accessible,” Hobbs said.
